even to conceal the fact of the existence guage in Asia to express the infamy of such a transaction, since the white ele-phant is the sacred emblem and abode of Burman d.vinity. It is addressed as "Lord of Lords." Priests prostrate beriain. Its retinue is fit for a prince of the royal blood. Not that such al-binos are very rare; in India, for in-sance, where it is not sacred, elephants patched with pink are by no means up But from time framemorial, when the

But from time immemorial, when the old Count of Ava was a great power in Asia, it has been one of the emblems of kingly rank, a symbol of a divnely given sovereignty, the incarnation of the favors of heaven, may, incarnate divinity itself. Sickness among the sacred animals was ominous of coming evil; their demeaner and gestures afforded angurles, auspicious or sinister. They were the oracles of Burmah, and more than this the Palladia too. Yet, for the rate of this, the Palladia too. Yet, for the sake of this, the Palladia too. Yet, for the sake of dollars, King Theebaw has sold a white elephant. He has plenty more, it is true—and elephants are expensive pets to keep—but in all its history d'd Egypt ever descend to bargain over a god, or liome or Greece part, for each or other consideration, with anything that is revered? That the elephant will like it is hardly probable, since it is one thing to be a sacred animal, fed upon all the delicacies of the season, and with nothing to do but march on great or asions in a procession, and quite another to become the property of a showman. s procession, and quite another to become the property of a showman.
These natural curiosities are provenbially delicate in constitution, and for all that the new possessor knows his Majesty may have sold him one that was already in ill health. King Thesbawis quite unscrupulous enough for any snormity—even getting the best of an American speculator.—Cor. London
